Image caption The Commission of Investigation said it had "reasonable grounds" to believe that patients were being harmed. A review of the heart transplant programme at University Hospital Galway has revealed serious concerns over patient safety. The report, by the Commission of Investigation, was published on Tuesday. It said it had "reasonable grounds to believe that patients were being harmed" as a result of "rushed" and "uncontrolled" procedures. The review was launched in September 2015 following an Irish Mirror investigation into the programme. A person may be a heart or lung transplant recipient if they are expected to live beyond four weeks in a severely ill person. It is the third time in three years that a high-profile review of the Galway programme has been published. In May 2014, it was revealed that a 14-year-old boy died on the same day as his mother had a heart transplant operation. And in February of this year, it was reported that another 14-year-old had died after his mother was given a heart transplant. The latest review, published on Tuesday, states that patients are "put at risk by not being able to access the transplant procedure, by the failure to adequately assess their suitability for transplant or by the routine practice of not informing the patient of the true nature and extent of their condition". It says that the heart transplant programme is "uncontrolled and non-functional" because of "rushed" and "uncontrolled" procedures. In October 2015, more than 1,500 heart transplant patients in the Republic of Ireland were sent letters to say their vital organ would no longer be available. Irish Minister for Health Simon Harris said the new system
