‘Missed calls’ to law enforcement raise concerns South Carolina’s new law regulating the use of electronic devices while driving has already caused at least one major traffic accident and may lead to more, according to two law enforcement officers. In the past three days, at least five “missed call” incidents involving electronic devices have been reported, said Lt. Steve Pritchett, spokesman for the South Carolina Highway Patrol. Gov. Nikki Haley signed a law in May making it illegal to use handheld cellphones and other electronic devices while driving, with exceptions for law enforcement officers, emergency personnel and those with a valid license to drive. Violators can be charged with careless driving or driving while using a cell phone without a hands-free device. State troopers have caught more than 150 drivers in the past two years using handheld devices, said Chief Tommy Collidge, spokesman for the South Carolina Department of Public Safety. The new law goes into effect Aug. 1. “I think we’ve already had a few accidents since the new law has gone into effect. I think the week was bad enough. That's going to happen," Collidge said. Pritchett said it is unclear if anyone will be charged for an accident caused by a missed call.

"We have yet to actually determine if the law has been violated. When it does, we'll have the charges," he said. Pritchett said troopers may not be able to charge the driver as some use them while holding a phone in their hands, such as when they're talking to another person or even when they're making a call. "You have to determine if the phone was being held in the hand, if it was being held on the chin, or if the driver was holding the phone in his hand when the accident occurred," Pritchett said. Corrie McNair, director of the Governor's Highway Safety Office, said officers have reported many crashes
