Cognitive performance is related to cardio-respiratory fitness and blood pressure in people with schizophrenia. We examined cognitive performance, blood pressure and cardio-respiratory fitness in a large group of participants with schizophrenia in relation to a healthy comparison group. Two hundred and sixty-three patients with schizophrenia and 87 healthy comparison subjects were included in the study. Cognitive performance, as indicated by the Brief Assessment of Cognition in Schizophrenia, was poorer in the patient group than in the comparison group. The patient group also had significantly higher resting systolic and diastolic blood pressures and significantly lower maximal aerobic capacity than the comparison group. Cognitive performance was associated with age, blood pressure, gender and maximal aerobic capacity, after controlling for the effects of clinical variables. Furthermore, age, gender and maximal aerobic capacity remained in the regression equation of cognitive performance. These findings provide further support for the role of cardiovascular factors in cognitive function in schizophrenia.
