Aspects will include the control of neurons by interneurons and neurotransmitter release in other neurons. In the hippocampus of mammals, some neurons (place cells) form maps of the external environment and provide an internal representation of spatial navigation. The cell types involved will be identified, and the transmitter associated with their functioning will be determined. The hypothesis that the histaminergic system is involved in spatial learning is being tested and will also be further investigated. Light and electron microscopy will be used to determine the synaptic connections of histaminergic neurons in the brain and spinal cord. The physiological role of histaminergic neurons will be studied in the isolated, segmented, pre- and postsynaptic preparations and in the intact nervous system. A non-amphetamine tryptamine, which is particularly active in arousal, will be synthesized and tested for its effects on nervous system transmission and learning. The synthesis of the non-amphetamine tryptamine and related compounds will be studied in order to learn more about the biochemical and biophysical events of presynaptic action. Marvin R. Gold (Ed.). Academic Press, New York, 1977. Immune response of mice to AHR and AP-1 knockout. The AHR and AP-1 proteins contribute to endothelial function. The aim of this study was to evaluate differences in the immune response of AHR and AP-1 knockout mice. BALB/c, AHR knockout (AHR(-/-)) and AHR(+/+) mice, C57BL/6 (B6), AP-1 knockout (AP-1(-/-)) and AP-1(+/+) mice were used. At 10 weeks of age, blood was collected from the retro-orbital plexus and cultured with and without endotoxin (lipopolysaccharide, LPS).
