The burning of the building reminded me of a movie when a bunch of people come upon a fire they have no idea is causing .Evidence has been mounting over the years that the United States is paying too much to borrow money to support too many unfunded social spending programs and entitlements such as Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security. Over the 10-year period from January 1998 to January 2008 the country's debt to GDP ratio grew to a whopping 109 percent of GDP from 53 percent of GDP. This isn't simply a partisan issue because the United States saw a similar increase in its debt ratio with the Clinton administration from 53 percent to 94 percent of GDP between January 1993 and January 1998. The issue of our national debt is on the front burner of Washington politics because Democrats want a bigger and more robust government and Republicans want a smaller and less expensive government. The Occupy Wall Street movement, which has been a catalyst for the recent Tea Party protests, has also revived the issue of government spending and debt. Let's look at the United States' debt to GDP ratio over the past decade and what it would look like under a no-tax austerity plan. To establish a baseline we'll begin with the year that was fiscal year 2008. In 2008, the year the United States saw its largest increase in debt to GDP ratio during the decade from 43 percent to 53 percent of GDP, the national debt was $11,823 billion. 1. Determine the new debt $11,823 billion 2. Set the debt-to-GDP ratio at

46 percent $11,823/24.34 * 100\% = 46\%$ Total amount of debt would be $12,979 billion or 97.3% of GDP 3. Set the budget as if the fiscal year started in January 2008, when the debt-to-GDP ratio was 53 percent of GDP $12,979 billion 4. Calculate the new budget that would meet the new debt level $$12,979 - $11,823 = ($1,156 \text{ billion})$ 5. Total spending would now be $13,014 billion and new spending would be $1,156 billion 6. Spend $1,236 billion
