ngentotQ: Is there a difference between InterlockedExchange(byte) and thread locking a byte? I have a structure that stores a collection of bytes. I need to be sure that the collection of bytes is read and written as the collection changes. My strategy was to use the

InterlockedExchange() function. However, I can also lock the byte value in the struct using a thread lock. The reason I ask is because I want to understand if I need to perform thread locking on each change to the value of bytes within the struct. That is, I want to be able to compare if I would need the same thread locking technique that I used on the InterlockedExchange() function. Is there a difference between a thread locking a byte value and using the InterlockedExchange() function? Thanks for reading. A: Yes, there is a difference: the byte returned by the function can be of any value and may not be exactly one byte. By contrast, if you lock a byte, you always get a byte, it will never be a different value, and you won't get a generalization error.

Exercise away stress HARTSVILLE, S.C. -- You may think it's hard to get away from the stress of the office, but exercise away stress for office workers can actually be more effective than a five-minute break from your desk. From an article in HealthDay: 3e33713323
