The USGS announced yesterday that it has determined that 2007 was the hottest year ever recorded in the United States, without exception. The previous record hottest year was 2005. See the USGS release below (hat tip: The Pielke Blog). The new record was determined by comparing current year results of about 80,000 temperature measurements with those of previous years. The graph below shows the unprecedented spike in temperature in the United States, which even more surprising is the sharp increase in temperature in the deep winter and spring months, compared to the summer and fall, as shown in the graph above. The broken line in the graph above shows the highest monthly average temperature (average of daily highs) in the United States: the old record is in black, and the new record is red. The average of daily highs is a temperature anomaly, not a reading of actual temperature (as shown in the monthly average in the graph above), but here the numbers are so dramatic and the trend so far out of the ordinary, it is easy to recognize that the temperature in the nation has been much higher in 2007 than ever previously recorded, including a few years during the 1940s when the US was not yet a nation. The US is approaching a "point of no return," according to a report by the Carnegie Institution's Ron Sen Gupta in the New York Times. This graph above shows the worldwide temperature record, as of Aug 17, 2007. The global anomaly is red,
