MOSCOW — From Russia with Love: New details are emerging about the techniques used by the NSA to gain access to private e-mail and social networking messages held by Yahoo!, and now, it appears, by Google as well. According to an account appearing in the Moscow Times and a separate story at techPresident, former Yahoo! spokesperson Albert Gidariis has alleged that the United States used software developed by the Israeli hi-tech firm NSO Group to crack encryption codes used by the systems behind the popular online communication services. The company, which develops such products for the defense industry, has previously confirmed using its technology to hack a phone belonging to a senior Mexican official in 2015, as well as to two journalists in India in 2016. According to the Russian newspaper, “a source from the American intelligence community confirmed that the U.S. government has been using the products developed by NSO Group.” The computer code used to access data is called Pegasus, and was developed by NSO Group in cooperation with Israeli intelligence and is then sold to government and intelligence agencies around the world, the Moscow Times reports. The Pegasus software provides “a backdoor into any device, protecting the adversary’s targets even when they have chosen strong encryption. The software allows the spy to snoop, eavesdrop, read, record, modify, and inject data into communications,” according to techPresident. NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden was reputedly paid by NSO Group to be an expert reviewer of the company’s software. “Intelligence agencies and law enforcement are now using Pegasus to install malware on target devices, which
