Our findings indicate that the IL33 gene is a susceptible locus in SS patients, although it is not the main cause. The IL33 gene is the first member of the IL-1 family to be connected with the pathophysiology of rheumatoid arthritis (RA).[@R26] The majority of the previous association studies on RA or SS have shown significant associations with common or rare variants located in the HLA region[@R3] or in other non-HLA regions (5q31.1, 6p21.3, 10p12)[@R11] and have therefore focused on the investigation of the HLA region in SS. Our study, however, shows that the IL33 gene is another possible susceptible locus in SS pathogenesis. This result is in agreement with a previous study that found an association between IL33 and RA.[@R26] This suggests that the IL33 gene may play a role in the pathogenesis of both SS and RA. The IL33 gene rs16924159 variant has previously been shown to be associated with arthritis in SS.[@R11] However, no association between rs16924159 and susceptibility to SS has been found. Nevertheless, it would be interesting to investigate whether the pathogenicity of rs16924159 might be different in patients with ankylosing spondylitis (AS), an inflammatory joint disorder closely related to RA, as we did in a small independent cohort. This finding warrants further functional studies to understand the molecular mechanisms underlying the association between the IL33 gene and SS. The IL33 rs1929992 variant has been shown to be associated with asthma, psoriasis, atopic dermatitis and Crohn disease, and to have no association with RA.[@R27] In the present study, we found that the IL33 rs1929992 variant was significantly associated with susceptibility to SS
