Pointing: the relationship between cognition and body orientation in adults with Down syndrome. Ten adults with Down syndrome (DS) and 10 age-, gender-, education-, and handedness-matched control adults participated in two tasks of pointing. In Experiment 1 the target was directly beneath the body center of mass of the participants. When the body was oriented in the same direction as the target, the hand moved slowly in the direction of the target, except in the case of four female participants who actively avoided the target. When the body was oriented in the opposite direction to the target, the hand moved slowly in the opposite direction. In Experiment 2, the targets were placed at six different distances from the body center of mass. When the body was in the same orientation as the target the hand moved slowly in the same direction, and when the body was oriented in the opposite direction, the hand moved slowly in the opposite direction. These results, although hardly conclusive, suggest that the processing of visual stimuli is guided by information coming from the vestibular system.
