Whether you are just starting out with graphic design, or you are an advanced user with many years of experience, we are going to show you how to take your images from the web and mobile devices, to the iPhone, iPad, Mac and PC. Before you begin, you will need some standard tools (that we are going to cover later in this article) in your browser. You can download the programs to your computer, but we'd recommend that you bookmark the links to them so that you will always have them saved to your browser. Although we will be mainly talking about using Photoshop for editing images, Photoshop Elements can be used for all sorts of things. You can edit texts, design websites, create image-based logos or even create 3D models from scratch.

- 1 – Image Browser Before you edit your photos, you'll need to download and install the Adobe Image Browser. Installing the Adobe Image Browser is easy.
- 1 – Open your browser of choice.
- 2 – Go to "Install" on the tab on the left side of the Adobe website.
- 3 – Click on "Adobe" and scroll to the bottom until you see "Image Browser". Click on this.
- 4 – Click the "Completely Untick the box to accept the license agreement and create your own password.
- 5 – Click the Check button and follow the onscreen instructions.

Now that you have finished installing the Adobe Image Browser, it's time to make it the default image browser in your browser.

- 2 – Open your browser preferences and go to the "External" menu.
- 3 – Click on "Add this Extension to the list" and then choose "Adobe Image Browser" from the menu that appears. Now that you have added the Adobe Image Browser to your browser, you will need to remove it from your computer to stop it from opening images when you browse.
- 3 – Close the Adobe Image Browser by going back to the "External" menu.
- 4 – Click on "Add this Extension" and choose "Adobe Image Browser" Once you have installed the Adobe Image Browser on your Mac or PC, you can now browse to any image on the web or mobile device and download it to your computer to open with Photoshop Elements.
- 5 – Open your image on the web or in any photo app

The present invention relates generally to the field of threading and more particularly to an improved method of rotating and driving a threaded member. In certain applications, it is necessary to rotate a threaded member, such as a screw, threaded rod, or the like, by means of a rotary drive which, when coupled to the threaded member, will cause the threaded member to rotate thereby. A number of existing rotary drives and drive systems have been developed to accomplish this task. For example, one common approach employs a stationary elongate base on which is mounted a threaded member. A nut is movably attached to the base and is adapted to be moved in a linear direction toward and away from the threaded member. As the nut is moved toward the threaded member, it will thread onto the threaded member, thereby rotatably driving the threaded member. Once the threaded member has reached a desired rotational position, the nut is moved away from the threaded member, whereupon the threaded member will remain at a desired rotational position. A number of problems, however, are associated with this type of apparatus. First, because the threaded member is free to move within the nut, the nut is not positively affixed to the threaded member, thereby allowing the nut to be jarred loose from the threaded member and/or the base. Second, in order to maintain the nut in a desired position relative to the threaded member, and therefor prevent the nut from being jarred loose, the nut must be biased with a spring or the like, which increases the cost and complexity of the apparatus. A second type of rotary drive which has been developed is adapted to prevent the nut from being jarred loose. This type of apparatus utilizes a drive member which is coupled to the nut and which includes one or more magnets. The magnets are attached to the nut and function to repel each other. Thus, when the nut is moved with respect to the threaded member, the magnets will repel each other, thereby maintaining the nut in the desired position and preventing the nut from being jarred loose. This type of apparatus, however, has a number of disadvantages. First, in order to locate the magnets in a desired position with respect to each other, the magnets must be positioned accurately with respect to each other, thereby adding to the complexity and cost of the apparatus. Second, the magnets are positioned at a specific distance from each other and, if the threaded member is not positioned at the center of the nut, the magnets will not be able to

Immunotherapy has revolutionized the treatment of many malignancies. The standard of care for melanoma, for example, has been changing in recent years with therapeutic intervention guided by the evolving discoveries of the tumor microenvironment and its critical role in cancer development. It is now accepted that the immune system is a double-edged sword, with tumor-infiltrating lymphocytes (TILs) having both anti-tumor and pro-tumorigenic roles in the tumor microenvironment, and the pro-tumorigenic phenotype being favored by melanoma cells (1-3). A significant proportion of melanoma cases carry a BRAF^{V600E} mutation, and therefore, therapy utilizing BRAF/MEK inhibitors has been a mainstay in the treatment of this disease. Notably, however, although some patients have a marked and durable clinical benefit, others show little clinical response (4). This variability in clinical outcome is most likely due to the complex interplay between the host immune system and the melanoma cells and the evolving efficacy of BRAF inhibitors. Moreover, although combination therapies of BRAF inhibitors with immunotherapies have been shown to result in improved outcomes over monotherapy in melanoma, a significant number of patients treated in this manner do not respond to the combination (5-7). Taken together, these data suggest that a more refined understanding of the interplay between melanoma cells and the tumor-immune microenvironment is required. The possibility that immune cells can play a pro- or anti-tumor role in tumor development is still being explored. Studies indicate that Th1 and CD8⁺ cytotoxic T cells are associated with tumor regression and improved patient survival, while Th2/Th17 cells (8-10) and regulatory T cells (Tregs) (11-13) are associated with immunosuppression and poor patient outcomes. In addition, the presence of Tregs and macrophages has been demonstrated to correlate with poor outcomes in melanoma (8-13). In addition, tumor immune cell infiltrates have been implicated as having prognostic importance in melanoma (14-16). The identification of such prognostic factors in melanoma could be useful in predicting outcome and possibly tailoring treatment. The tumor microenvironment also appears to be important in the role of effector T cells in tumor regression. The current paradigm, as described by Murillo-Incera, M. et al. (15), is that effector T
