* The best way to learn new features of Photoshop is to spend as much time as possible using the program as you learn, or read how-to books. * Photoshop has many features, and learning about them is like a cupboard full of tools; one type of tool is like learning about the meaning of a word. You need to start using it to get a feel for what you are learning about. * You can read about using features and get a feel for how they work, but you'll be more effective if you actually use them in Photoshop. * Photoshop provides learning materials that run through tutorials, but one problem is that they usually cover the latest versions of the program. You need to find older versions of the tutorial materials and use them to learn the features of older version of Photoshop. For example, Photoshop CS5 includes changes from CS3, and you need to look at older versions of the tutorial material to learn about the features that were available back then. * * * # Photoshopping If you're more interested in photography rather than graphic design, the free online image editor, Pixlr-o-matic, is a good choice. It has a large gallery of editing options for handling photos. You can crop and resize the image, and use the many tools to alter the highlights, shadows, brightness, and contrast. You can also edit your photos on other websites such as SmugMug (), which offers a free online photo-editing service. ## Keeping It Current Photoshop CS4 introduced an entirely new layer editing model that has had a big impact on using Photoshop for both beginners and advanced users. In previous versions, Photoshop did not have the ability to make new layers, so each layer was a single object that could not be edited separately. The new approach gives users the ability to make new layers, so they can arrange layers in the way they want to. The new system is referred to as the Layers panel in Photoshop CS5. The Layers panel displays the layers in the order they were created. You can move a layer from one location to another, crop a layer, resize a layer, or add text or shape layers. You can also edit and manipulate each layer independently. Figure 10-2 shows the Layers panel with the Gellike tool selected, and the image seen in Figure 10-1. Figure

Editor's note: Rory Meyers is a Republican who served in the Virginia House of Delegates from 2006 to 2012 and as Lieutenant Governor of Virginia from 2012 to 2014. He retired from politics in December 2014 to co-found Meyers and Associates, a public relations firm in Northern Virginia. His opinions do not reflect the views of the Associated Press or of Meyers and Associates. (CNN) -- Republican congressional candidate Karen Handel almost never talks politics at her leafy Atlanta suburban home. Usually, when an interviewer approaches, she asks, "Is this okay? Would you mind if I get a cup of coffee?" Handel's aversion to the political stuff is easily explained: She's a wife and a mom. She had to have second thoughts when liberal journalist Michael Tomasky, a frequent critic of her opponent Jon Ossoff, recently asked her for a sit-down interview to talk about "Karen Ossoff," the doppelganger candidate created by her campaign. "Are you hiring him?" Tomasky asked. Handel leaned back and uttered the single word that has become the new defense of the Democratic campaign to win a congressional district in northern Atlanta, Georgia: "No." The race has been a top story in the national media since Ossoff, a 30-year-old Democratic congressional candidate, pulled off an upset and knocked out the four-term incumbent, Tom Price, in June. "Karen Ossoff" has been running a full-court press, including ads on local cable television and network ads, and has hundreds of volunteers working the phones in the district and talking to potential voters, and boasts in some of his ads that he's being opposed by the Republicans' Karen Handel. Brock Bierman, the communications director for Ossoff's campaign, says he and Handel's team are well-aware of each other and each other's campaign. "We want to win this race, and we have to be prepared to compete against whoever the Republican nominee is," Bierman told me. They've decided that they're not going to be rivals on the campaign trail. Handel's spokesman says Ossoff is in constant contact with the campaign, but when I asked Handel's director of communications about his "enemy" campaign, spokeswoman Maureen Brown said she didn't know what the problem was. "This is getting quite silly. The
